

The infographic based on Linda Tuhiwai Smith's Book "Decolonizing Methodologies Research and Indigenous Peoples" acknowledged many negative aspects that indigenous people experienced throughout their life including research. It is important to bring awareness on how colonization and their Western model of research affected indigenous people. "Decolonizing Research" infographic addresses the central themes of the textbook. The design and content were tailored to reflect Smith's analysis of how Western research has historically affected Indigenous knowledge, rights, research, and culture. It also brings awareness on how society can help with decolonizing research and empower communities while also learning about them. As for my visual approach, I implemented historical tones by using neutral colors, torn paper, and vintage maps to reflect colonization's history and clip art of researchers with a lense to demonstrate that looking at research through indigenous lenses is essential. They also bring awareness to researchers and the globes are a visual reminder that colonization and Western style research affected everyone. The infographic was divided into five parts to help address Smith's book; the first one is history, it acknowledges that Western research dismissed Indigenous knowledge, it justified colonization, and they had no consent to collect their artifacts. The second part addresses that their culture and beliefs were not respected. The third section offers steps to follow to validate Indigenous knowledge and Indigenous research. Lastly, I added the 25 indigenous projects from Smith's discussion that talks about how Indigenous people have reclaimed research and have led their own research. I put five strategies that Indigenous people have approached them being claiming, story telling, representing, restoring and protecting. Overall, the infographic addresses and acknowledges arguments of Decolonizing Methodologies. It brings awareness to the colonized roots of research and encourages society to keep learning on Indigenous research through their lens rather than the Western models.

References

Smith, L. T. (1999). Decolonizing methodologies: Research and Indigenous peoples (1st ed.). Zed Books.